Security Software The speed of today's world cannot be denied, nor can the quick pace of life we live in today. With our ancestors living a full existence on a single continent and the rest of the world as a remote backwater, communication times were extremely slow, and therefore having to stop to communicate with other humans involved the same amount of time as if we were all in one room. No wonder, then, that there are only a couple of inventions that altered this situation in terms of evolution of mankind, the Internet, being the most recent and biggest one. Fast-forward to our time, and with the widespread use of the Internet, more and more applications are being released every day. In a way, though, it could also be said that they are being released too quickly, as it would only be a matter of time before most of these applications would become obsolete due to the introduction of new, better ones. Therefore, it is not hard to see that the security software industry is also racing to keep up with the demands and hence the emergence of new security applications. Fisheye Explorer is one of them, and whether you like it or not, this application is being developed, tested and released with the same speed as the rest of its peers in the security software industry. Yet, when you take a look at how the development of the software has been conducted so far, you would agree with the following statement: the development of Fisheye Explorer is as safe as any other application under development. More specifically, you might be wondering if the development of Fisheye Explorer could potentially harm your computer if it were to be released on the market. Well, the answer to that question is definitely yes, but, as we will see below, it is not a very serious one and should not represent an issue that might
