Tag Archives: Flute I was asked recently by a school group on a visit to the museum what my favorite piece was. It was a difficult question, since I often find I fall in love with a piece after the first or second time I see it. That sort of thing tends to happen in my field, but that was probably one of the easier questions! I was tempted to give a lot of names, because I have many favorites, but it was probably a good thing to have a sensible answer. I'm very fond of the Bird of Paradise iridescent flute made for Queen Victoria from a butterfly wing. It was used in a ceremony in her honor, and the Royal Court was there to witness the ceremony. Because it's so delicate, I'm afraid it's a bit out of the question, but it was in the ceremony, and it really is beautiful. Another very difficult piece to choose is the original woodwind reed from the Giverny paintings made for Bernard Berenson. That's another piece I've seen many times, and each time I was bowled over by it. Another wonderful thing, but possibly not as important, is to hear everything in a museum played, especially when the accompaniment is so essential to the understanding of the piece. At the Metropolitan Museum this is very easy to hear, because there are musicians playing in the galleries at the same time as there are exhibitions going on. Another great aspect of The Met that made me fall in love with it even before I took the job here is the Galleries of Sculpture. It's a wonderful collection, and it has had so many artists pass through, including Henri Matisse and Pierre Bonnard. Other artists whom I love include El Greco, Vincent Van Gogh, even a little Michelangelo — I love his Adam. I really admire Ralph Lauren's work, and I love Picasso's work when it's in black and white. I love Goya's paintings, and I love the Impressionists, though I don't know much about the work of the masters. One of my favorite pieces is Picasso's "Seated Harlequin." It's a very beautiful, very large work. I can't stand the style, but I do love it. And I do like Jasper

A comparison of temporary and permanent shunt rates after carotid endarterectomy. Two hundred twenty-six patients were randomly assigned to temporary shunt (n = 127) or permanent shunt (n = 99) use after carotid endarterectomy. Patients were studied clinically and angiographically at 1, 3, and 12 months. Cumulative shunt rates at 1 year (12 +/- 2% and 17 +/- 2% for temporary and permanent shunt groups, respectively; p = 0.15) and at 3 years (27 +/- 3% and 30 +/- 3% for temporary and permanent shunt groups, respectively; p = 0.12) were similar. Use of permanent shunt was associated with higher total morbidity (30% compared to 24%, p = 0.05). However, postoperative neurologic morbidity was similar (0% temporary vs 0% permanent shunt; p = 1.0). No perioperative strokes or deaths were seen in either group. We conclude that temporary shunt use after carotid endarterectomy confers no demonstrable advantage over a permanent shunt and adds significant cost and morbidity. This invention relates to an outboard motor.

In marine propulsion devices of this kind, it is desirable to mount the exhaust gas within the water of the body of water in which the outboard motor is being used, in order that the exhaust gases will not impinge on or damage the drive unit. Various arrangements have been proposed for achieving this, such as shown in U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,998,071, 4,094,206, and 4,108,389. In the case of the arrangement shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,998,071, the exhaust gases pass through a chamber extending below the engine. The chamber is formed within a hydrostat, and the exhaust gases are directed via an
