Once you see that pattern, there are two obvious subsets of rows that can be mined, and the number of rows in each subset will always be equal. On the other hand, I have another dataset containing a group of rows. These rows follow a different pattern. Once you see that pattern, there is one obvious subset of rows that can be mined, but the number of rows in the subset can vary. Question: How can we combine these two separate subsets? Case 1) Here is my initial data: Here are the two subsets that follow the pattern: Case 2) Here is the initial data: Here are the two subsets that follow the pattern: Basically, what I want to end up with is a dataset that has one row per this form: What I'm thinking right now is a group by on both table_a.section_number and table_b.section_number, but I'm having trouble translating that to SQL. Would that even be the best approach? Do I need to write a VBA routine to connect to the DB, then find the number of rows in each section and return that in its own column? Thanks! A: You could use apply and lag to get the rolling MAX for each ID and section and use that in a CASE statement to choose the MAX roll or the MIN roll. In MySQL: select i.*, case when t1.section_number is not null then (

Bir-nirAn idol that can be useful in a study of the criminal world. He became corrupt but perhaps has found his true path.

ElsinaElisa is an idol from an age of civilization. He is used to judge the justice of a case. Definitely an idol to visit in real life!

For those of you who do not know, it was part of the reason why I switched over to Microsoft products years ago. I have owned the domain for 20 years and have attended countless small conventions for the game. To be honest, I haven't played RTS in years and I will not miss it. The Secret Operatives was a personal project I worked on for hobby, fun, and to let the younger generation know how much we missed the good old days. I will still be around, you will see... 2 comments, already Anthony on February 25, 2018 at 09:20 That is sad... to me the Secret Operatives was like this game's version of the TSR domain name though... it was both a home and a place I escaped to.
