What's new in Aurora:

Leigh Mary Anne Evans (later known as Aurora Leigh; born Mary Anne Teresa Augusta Blake; 23 January 1816 - 14 April 1898) was an English romantic-era novelist, dramatist, critic, editor, and poet. Born in London, she was the eldest child of Sir William Evans, 1st Baronet, and Ellen Smith. From an early age, she was destined to be a writer, and the patronage of her uncle, the 3rd Earl Fitzwilliam, was instrumental in advancing her career. She received an education at home as well as at various schools for wealthy girls. She lived with her uncle for over sixteen years, and he could not resist securing her hand in marriage. However, when the marriage took place, she was estranged from her husband because he was an atheist. She began writing as soon as she was able to support herself, selling poems and prose to journals and newspapers. Because of her serious and introverted nature, she was hardly recognized as a writer, but her poetry and novels began to be appreciated increasingly. Her first work of prose was won in 1835 by her uncle Lord Albert Russell, who predicted her literary career. Thus, she gained attention and gained many opportunities to work. Though her close relationship with Lord Fitzwilliam helped her, she also acquired numerous male friends whom she loved tremendously. She slowly rose through the literary world and even received commendations and several prizes from King George IV. She met many famous literary figures such as Charles Dickens, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and William Makepeace Thackeray. Thackeray acknowledged her as a great talent and supported her financially. From 1854 to 1864, Leigh lived with Dickens at Gad's Hill Place, and they shared their views on almost all topics. While he was away from England from 1864 to 1871, Leigh edited magazines, including Temple Bar, and worked on novels. Her writings made her the first intellectualist writer of her period. She had a highly developed sense of humor, and she published humorous works such as the Tale of Two Cities. She also wrote factual and popular works. Aurora Leigh is regarded as one of the best representatives of the mid-Victorian era. She was extremely shy and intensely private; even her opinions were communicated secretly. It was said that she was "poetically sentimental but with a soundly grounded nature". She died of a heart attack in 1898. Life Early life and education Mary Anne Evans was born on 23 January 1816 in Little P
