We obtained similar graft deformation effects after HSCT and allo-HSCT with an average deformation of 25%. The deformation of the flanks and thighs tend to mimic the posture of the patient. These effects were applied to mimic the deformed posture during postural instability due to injury, surgery, bedsores, cancer, stiffness, MSD, and other diseases. Tussuselike simulation applied to both voluntary and involuntary postural instability. Since [[@CR13]] reported a tendency of older participants to make larger deformation when they assume an active standing posture, we also considered age dependence on the postural instability. Most of the patients in our study were older than 60 years. HSCT and allo-HSCT were performed for elderly patients under artificial condition. The state of artificial environment was different from the patient's living environment. We should consider the effect of state difference. Applying the Tussuselike simulation to different movement types is another issue. \[[@CR24]] reported the correlation between postural sway patterns and the speed of walking. They also reported that a lower walking speed was associated with a larger sway. This suggests that Tussuselike simulation can better express the influence of a lower walking speed on standing posture.
