newest games and updates by visiting A BAD year for stocks, the S&P 500 Index is finally starting to show some life. With disappointing earnings, some bad weather and other troubles, the benchmark index had closed 5% below its all-time high in January. In February, it hit another low, and has since rebounded, though it's still 11% below its December peak. That's the one-year return. What's the track record for the next 10 years? As The Times's Nicholas Fandos reported, the S&P 500 has a long run for the ages. It has returned an average of 10.5% a year over the last 13 years. As with many long-term measures, however, that is not an accurate picture. The market has not been an evenly distributed winner or loser over the past 13 years. The stock market's performance has varied widely month to month, and has swung for a variety of reasons. Mr. Fandos noted that the S&P 500 rose in January even as dismal earnings season continued, thanks to an unusually good performance by the most expensive sector, technology. In the four calendar quarters since the start of last year, the industry lost 13.7% of its value. As for the year's second-best-performing sector, financials, it has lost 7.9% since the start of 2015.
