Darkrunner " Adult Modeling " 464,447. A leaner, meaner website? Just the other day, my teenage son sat watching Pawn Stars on A&E - just me and him, with no other family members around to look over his shoulder. He asked me why some of the dummies' names were so long. I told him it was because the first time I saw them, years ago when I was 14 or 15, I had no idea how to spell their names. And so I just memorized them and now I call them by their names. "What's up with that?" he asked. The thing about learning how to spell people's names in such a short amount of time is that, if you don't keep up with it, the knowledge slowly fades away. So how do we keep up with this? How do we keep accurate lexicons of everybody's names, even when we're kids? The magic of Google.com There are websites that track names and you can simply type a person's name into the search bar and they will list the most common ways of spelling the name. But those websites don't work the same way as Google.com does. Google does a better job of indexing every reference it finds when a person's name is searched. So even if I say "Jeremy Beadles" and Google finds a "Jeremy Beadle", I can also find "a Jeremy Beadles," "Jeremy Beadle," "Jeremy B
