A single-subject experimental design was used to investigate a 20-wk protocol of progressive resistance exercise in 2 children with spina bifida (SB). The primary aim was to compare the effects of 3 groups who received 7 common training protocols on isokinetic strength, endurance, upper and lower body flexibility, and lower body endurance. A second aim was to compare the effects of gender, age, level of lesion, and gross motor function on physical variables. 3 comparison groups comprised 3 children with SB (n = 9), aged 8.0 +/- 0.9 y, who participated in a progressive resistance exercise protocol (PRP, group 1), a progressive endurance training protocol (PET, group 2), or no exercise (NEE, group 3). The 7 common training protocols used in groups 1 and 2 comprised a unilateral lower limb strength training protocol, followed by a consecutive bilateral lower limb strength training protocol, followed by bilateral lower limb and bilateral upper limb flexor and extensor strength training protocols. Groups 1 and 2 participated in 20 wk of resistance and endurance training with 1-wk intervals between protocols. In addition, group 1 performed bilateral lower limb and lower body endurance training. Isokinetic hamstring, quadriceps, and lower
