This closed beta test version requires basic PS4 system functions. A more in-depth system test will be occurring in the coming days.

It's been rumored that the new Xbox One Elite Controller is delayed. But then some release information was leaked via the preorder page. We even got a look at a mockup.. And it looks more or less the same as the Xbox 360 controller with a couple of cosmetic differences

It's a long time coming, but according to IGN its definitely coming, and its only on the Wii U.

Whether accurate or not, a rumor claiming that Wii U owners are going to be able to trick or treat as well as Nintendo TVii users is exciting news. However, I don't think there's any real substance to this rumor but its just nice that something is new for the Wii U gamepad.

Q: How can I populate a hash in D from a vector of vectors I am trying to convert the following C structure to D typedef struct { int n_boxes; std::vector> bounding_boxes; } coeff_t; where the fields are as follows (starting at index 0: {0,1,2,3,4} In D I have the following struct coeff { uint n_boxes; std.vector> bounding_boxes; }

However when I populate the struct using auto coeff = coeff(vec![1,2,3,4,5]); I get the following error: error[E0271]: type mismatch in coercion between `test.d.std.vector>' and `test.d.std.vector >>' --> test.d(34): requirement `test.d.std.vector>' is not satisfied | 34 | coeff(vec![1,2,3,4,5]); | ^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^ | note: to make the type-check pass, use `-D test.d` Can someone explain what I am doing wrong? A: The signature you're using does not match the typedef in the C code. You want struct coeff { uint n_boxes; std.vector> bounding_boxes; } You can then call the constructor with a tuple: coeff(uint n_boxes, std.vector> bounding_boxes); Alternatively, you can expand the C struct to bff6bb2d33
