While some drivers like the extra visibility that comes with added mirrors, others are concerned that they're prying into the blind spots of other drivers. In 2002, the result of a lawsuit filed in California, for one, hit some Bay Area drivers in the pocketbook when the state's Supreme Court overturned an earlier law that prohibited license plates on the tops of car mirrors. Individual states have different restrictions on where custom plates may be placed. Some carmakers, like Toyota and General Motors, offer feature films to help drivers remember to switch their vehicles' automatic headlights on and off. Other companies, however, are pushing the technology behind automatic door opening. In response to the prevalence of locked cars, automakers like Volvo and BMW are seeing sales of their high-end cars grow during the busy holiday season. While gas prices continue to climb, the average price for a gallon of regular unleaded fuel for Tuesday afternoon in the Bay Area remained unchanged at $1.96 a gallon, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration. According to an American Automobile Association survey, for the first time since 2004, satisfaction among American drivers is at the lowest level it's been in 13 years. In fact, just 35 percent of motorists say they're very satisfied or satisfied with their vehicles, while 42 percent say they are either unsatisfied or very unsatisfied. The concerns about police traffic stops driving automakers' sales have reached a tipping point, Toyota hopes to make up for its latest setback with a successful run at the March 24 sell-off of the manufacturing share of American Motors, SRI's main holding. The auto giant invested $450 million in the company. But as citizens gaze in awe at the $100,000 alternative fuel vehicle Nissan had parked in front of the Mississippi Sports Hall of Fame before the U.S. energy secretary canceled the event, they face a familiar dilemma: Get to the bay or go green? The time is about right for the city's transportation police to implement this new red-light system, as a condition of receiving federal funds for it. But the city can't stop there. Until the system is in place, the city should consider installing the countdown clocks at a half-dozen other intersections and require the transportation department's first-priority list to specify which intersections must have the clocks during the 24-hour period that begins at 6 a.m. next Tuesday. Cyclists are taking their biggest showdown
