Email NECC members discuss working conditions during the Board of Directors meeting on Jan. 30, 2012, in Truckee, Calif. By Kristen Taketa, Associated Press TRUCKEE, Calif. — Three years after air traffic controllers at the Reno/Tahoe International Airport went on strike, a union representing them wants to know what the National Mediation Board has to say about what happened. In a legal action filed Thursday, the National Air Traffic Controllers Association requested the agency investigate whether the Reno/Tahoe International Airport is a “unified work site.” That would mean the union would be able to file a complaint with the board. The union contends Reno was an illegal strike, arguing the airport was one unit but that the FAA hadn’t taken any action. The union wants to know what all involved in the airport, from the FAA to private contractors, did to ensure it was a single location for air traffic control. Aircraft were grounded in Reno/Tahoe International Airport in June 2011 as union members walked off the job. The NAMCRA cited a series of incidents that affected the airport since the strike, including the revocation of the staffs of six controllers, the change of the airport’s radio frequency and a statement by the FAA that the strikers could not be trusted to ensure safety. “All these things, taken together, you could certainly describe as erratic,” said James Lyng, an attorney representing NAMCRA. “We certainly think they have created a unified work site.” NAMCRA previously went to the board when another air traffic controller went on strike at the same airport in 2008. That action was dropped after negotiations between the union and the airport broke down. In its complaint, NAMCRA also cites a legal provision that would allow it to reach an agreement with the airport regarding working conditions. It says it’s willing to continue to bargain, but has not received an offer from the airport. “They’re talking about dates, changing things, and they haven’t said what kind of
