On the fate of selenomethionine and dimethyl selenide during the germination of barley (Hordeum vulgare) seeds. The fate of the radiolabelled selenium from selenomethionine (SeMet) and dimethyl selenide (DMSe) added to barley (Hordeum vulgare) seeds has been followed in the following series of experiments: Seed washing by hydrochloric acid; seed germination; addition of stable isotope ¹⁵N-labelled nitrogen as a component of the seed coat and testa and seminal plasma; and seed release of DMSe and SeMet in the seed coat exudate. Seed germination was accompanied by the incorporation of ¹⁴C-labelled Cd into the testa and the elimination of Se into the seed coat exudate. The ¹⁵N-labelled nitrogen in the seed coat and the testa was reduced to much lower amounts compared to the unlabelled nitrogen in the testa and the seed coat, while the quantity of ¹⁵N-labelled nitrogen in the seminal plasma increased. Only 6% of the SeMet added was found to be bound to the seed in intact testa and seed coat. The majority (46%) of the added DMSe was metabolized during seed germination, while 49% of the DMSe added was recovered in the seed coat exudate. The sports columnist for the Washington Post got some great insight on the difference between a good football player and a great one when he talked to former Washington Redskins running back Clinton Portis. The difference, he says, is the ability to make something out of nothing. When Portis was in college at the University of Florida, his mom, Kathy, and his dad, Frank, put in so much work to help him get where he is that people now just see a product of their efforts. Portis developed his knack for making something out of nothing into a common routine. "Some of the greatest athletes in the history of the world
