We are seeing some improvements in certain areas of the game, and we will tell you more about those in the coming months. We wanted to share with you what we've been testing internally and how it impacts the game experience. Player Impact VFX Players will impact the ball differently. A player's movements, weight and momentum will affect the trajectory of the ball. Some of these impacts will be more noticeable at short- and mid-range attacks, and these will look more exaggerated with each player's positioning on the pitch. The ball will also feel more responsive when dribbling and passing, and each player's inertia will affect the movement of the ball more. When a player carrying the ball jumps, the ball will tumble faster, and the player will have greater control over the ball, even when they are in the air. Efficient dribbling will feel more natural, and we are testing all aspects of the handling of the ball using more player-specific actions, such as dribbling with the side of the foot, and passing with the inside of the foot. The first step is for players to react to the ball in play, rather than watching a ball that has already gone. This will enable players to react faster to the challenges around them in-game, and this will also have a positive impact on the overall responsiveness of the game. The players will now run more naturally. Players will still have their own individual stamina and fatigue levels, and their movement will feel more realistic. We want to provide a better feel for the decision-making of players, so that the player in possession feels more connected to the rest of the game, rather than just being a static, single unit. To do this, we have introduced ball and player intelligence systems to enable more player-specific actions. An AI can now calculate the direction in which a player is moving, and an AI will attempt to move the ball to a specific area of the field, avoiding players. Players will react quicker to your positioning, and you can control players' pace and movement at all times. Teams will have more use of the ground. Players can now use the ground more naturally, positioning themselves in the best area to perform a specific action. This will create new tactical opportunities for teams and will have an impact on the way you approach the game. Your team's attack is influenced by player actions
