I have been told that the gene description is usually the last word in genomic resource, so I would like to know which accession number should be used for gene description. I have looked through the SGD resource but there is no clear information on the webpage. The papers I have used as reference are (author is unknown, doi from pubmed): The gold standard of excellence in cytogenetics is: Sherer, A.J., Bailey, K.H., and Metais, J.D. (1980). Bone: Structure and function. E.M. Day Academic Press, New York, NY, pp.27-35. What is the main gene description accession number you are using when you speak of 'The gene X is expressed from X chromosome' or 'The gene Y is not present in Mmm Y chromosome, but is present in Mmm X chromosome'? A: There is no single accession that matches the description of a gene. Every gene has an identifier, and if you are aware that you are looking at a gene you will refer to its identifier, not its description. An identifier for a gene should contain information about the sequence, the expression level, the genotype, and the phenotypic effects. For many organisms, you will have four data types: Sequence Tissue expression Strains used to test the phenotype Experimental methods used to test the phenotype Ideally

We all know what FIFA is right? Football sim? Well, it is. What did we need to overhaul? Well, the way a player's heading reads. We needed to simulate the way the ball is actually heading, not the way a player facing it decides to head the ball. How do we do this? The way we can simulate the ball flying through the air as it does in real life is to use a real physics engine (but we also have updated the visuals and animations for a better overall look). Our out-of-this-world physics engine is called Euphoria. It is as powerful as any physics engine out there, meaning the gameplay and physics work perfectly together. Just as with real life football, Euphoria will read how the player and ball are moving relative to each other, then actually calculate how the ball will behave based on those movements. We've even added a bunch of new animations to this year's game. New collision polygons and better animations such as low bend and pivot movements to make you look and feel like a real football star. The basics have not changed. We have reintroduced the Fan and MannerView, giving fans and players a complete overview of the pitch in real time. They can also be used as a scouting tool, turning on Dynamic Events to find out where the big opportunities are. Speaking of which, scoring goals is now more realistic. Goalkeepers are much more influential on a match. Teams have more of an ability to close down space between the opposition and the goal in the last third. What do we think has been improved? It's hard to define our improvements but we will try. For a start, we are less dependent on the weather. There are never any cracks in the pitch when it's cold and in the snow it takes ages to sink in. We've reduced the amount of times when you see the effect of the "weight of the crowd" when playing at a stadium. The atmosphere has been improved, with fans reacting differently to goals as they travel through the stands. Emotions are also felt across the pitch as the mood in the stadium is set by individual players and that will change the crowd. We've also added in all the new stadiums released since the game last hit shelves. With the addition of new stadiums you can now make your team a home
