Throughout the last two weeks of 11th Grade, I've been reading The Sun Also Rises by Ernest Hemingway, and I have been enjoying it immensely. Along with being able to grasp the story, understand what is being said, and even easily be led by the characters, the entire book has inspired and made me feel something that I had never felt before: I want to be a writer. Whenever I have a creative outlet that I want to pursue and would be willing to pursue, I find that it distracts me and that I lose focus. Something always starts to trigger the "writer's block", and I have to stop the writing because I would start to feel so "stupid" about even trying to write. I was in school as a graphic designer and an art teacher, so I never really thought about writing before. It's strange how something like a class can develop a love of writing for you when you would never think it would. During my summer break, I have been reading the book several times, and I am very far away from having "writer's block". I write like I haven't really written before. I feel like I am just slipping away and becoming my character and persona. And no matter how crazy and crazy a day I may be on (crazy in the good way) writing always keeps me grounded. Writing provides me with a sense of purpose and acceptance, even if it is just a small part of a large sense of self-discovery. I love it. I had wanted to read this book before, but I always just heard it was too long and boring. I might have found a reason to say that about other books, but this book was something different. It was short, but at the same time, it was pretty in depth. It took a long time to get to the story, but it was worth it. It's probably one of the most life-changing books I have ever read, and it is definitely my favorite. The book is about a young man who owns a fishing boat named The Bull, and he is on his way back to Spain with his two friends, a writer, Carlos, and an actress, Lady Brett e79caf774b

They plan to use the BFR for the first time for an uncrewed demonstration launch, which will be performed in January 2019. Then SpaceX will move on to the follow-on launches for the BFR that will use crewed spacecraft. As soon as SpaceX is able to switch from the BFR to the Dream Chaser they will be able to begin their manned flight tests, assuming that NASA and the Space Coast is willing to relinquish authority over their precious launch pads for NASA commercial vehicles. On the surface, this sounds like a great outcome, but the reality is that the BFR is a risky venture even without the Dream Chaser. The BFR rocket uses the sort of advanced rocket technology that has never been flown before, and there are many high-risk elements. If the BFR fails, NASA and the Space Coast will likely be out $1.25 billion, the losses will fall on the taxpayers, and NASA will be forced to cancel the entire SpaceX BFR contract. If the BFR is successful, the Falcon 9 Block 5 has many limitations which means that the contracts for the human landings will be far more expensive than the BFR contract. In addition, there is no guarantee that the Falcon 9 Block 5 will be able to perform human landings, and it is uncertain that SpaceX will retain their human lander technology. If they do, it will be a long time before they can even begin to test human landings on an uncrewed vehicle, such as the Dragon 2 which is used by SpaceX for cargo landings. In addition, the most likely scenario is that SpaceX will receive contracts which
