(LGS) Television s Theatres Taschenbuch. Contraceptive use in Asia. In the last decade, there has been a switch to long-term reversible methods, primarily barrier methods. The changes are partly due to population growth, limited resources, and the declining costs of the reversible methods. Long-term reversible methods are particularly useful in the developing countries where more young women are having their first child, and for women who wish to space their children. A number of factors contribute to the poor use of such methods in developing countries. These include women's limited education, lack of information and misconceptions, cultural barriers to using methods, health care system deficiencies, and contraceptive supply shortages. Religious and cultural barriers
