You.Mosaic of interior mosaics and framed art pieces are scattered around the home of Andrea Skjefta and Nikos Skjefta. Andrea, a nurse, lives with her husband and three children in their home in the Montana sub-district of Salt Lake City. Nikos, a carpenter and electrician, lives here with his family as well. Both have lived in their homes for decades and moved to the area from other parts of the country. In their new neighbourhood they found low-cost houses for a reasonable price, and now have the quality of life that they had hoped for. "We like the area because it is quiet and beautiful," says Nikos. The South Highland neighbourhood, located in the southeast corner of Salt Lake City, is a family-friendly place. There are three schools within walking distance for the Skjeftes' children, and local shops, several parks and a tennis court are also within walking distance. Salt Lake City skyline Salt Lake City has a thriving economy and is growing fast. The population is expected to top 2 million this year. Its low cost of living and predictable weather make it attractive to businesses and workers alike. That's why Mark Graham, a software designer, moved here from Oregon. "The most important things for me were the low housing costs and the city's culture," he says. He bought a three-bedroom house with his girlfriend in South Highland three years ago. He is careful not to overburden her with his new urban lifestyle. "We try to be mindful of our carbon footprint in our everyday lives," he says. Graham, who had lived in Oregon, has learned to become more eco-conscious because he would like to raise his son in Salt Lake City.
