The year is 2076, 23 years after the major wars have concluded. Industrial civilization has finally progressed to the point where a commercial interstellar travel is possible. The laws of physics allow for a drive that never stops, so the desolation of space is just a dream for the tourist. In this future, a man desperate to continue his work after the murder of his partner becomes marooned on a seed ship, where everything beyond the stars is covered in ice. The only way to survive is to collect coffee. Every cubic meter of space has a colony of beans guarded by police robots, and it's the job of an impoverished teen to earn enough money to keep him alive. To his surprise, the innocent man slowly uncovers that his actions have given him the power to change the future, perhaps even send an inflection point in human history. I am capturing both the Ctrl-C type of return codes and the 'normal' NT write errors and I want to handle them differently. I am aware of the possibility that a Windows service can stop its self without doing the standard 'ERROR_SUCCESS' before returning. This means that NT will return the service's return code and NOT a standard NT return code. I want to have something that will allow my application to handle these errors in an otherwise standard way, and not have the errors stop in the middle of my application. A: The most common method is to create your own Application event log. Go into Event Viewer, and in the left pane select 'Windows Application'. In the list at the top select 'Create log'. Give it a name and description, and you can use the same underlying Event Log infrastructure that Event Viewer uses, and then just create a new type of event and then you can capture the error messages you want. When you create your log, you should set 'Apply to all the users' to 'no user'. The event log is so verbose that it will be a huge pain to have it apply to everyone. Note: If you need more granular control, then look into psexec (a Windows tool) instead of 'application logging'. The psexec will allow you to run a process in the context of another user (the target process). Q: JSTL basic scriptlet I have a java class "MyClass" where I have a method that is public int getRowCount() { int cRowCount; Statement s = null; try { s =
