The purpose of this work was to develop a method of quality assurance for dose and scatter distribution using diffraction gratings, and to establish the potential use of such a technique for manufacturing components in kilovoltage X-ray radiotherapy. The critical feature of the method was to use a motorized lead collimating wedge whose movement can be controlled using a programmable control system. The effect of the lead collimating wedge on the diffraction pattern from a diffraction grating was measured by image analysis. This was performed as a function of the collimation distance, and the effects of the wedge on the measured grating image were determined. Both the ideal behavior of diffraction gratings and the measured behavior of diffraction gratings for ideal geometries were modeled using the Ewald sphere approximation. The measured behavior was quantified by the frequency spectrum of the measured diffraction pattern. The modeled Ewald sphere behavior was quantified by introducing a characteristic degree of focus on the incident ray, which is the angle that the grating diffracts an incident ray in the air-water interface. The measured diffraction patterns, when collimated by the lead wedge, were modeled by decreasing the incident ray collimation and decrease in focus as a function of collimation distance from the wedge. The decrease in collimation distance and focus with collimation of the wedge resulted in an increase in scatter and decrease in dose and number of primary scattering events from the detector. This method of scatter measurement is a function of collimation distance and can be used to quantitatively determine the fraction of radiation scattered by materials used in kilovoltage X-ray radiotherapy. The Ewald sphere model used for this study can be used to predict the scattering behavior of materials used in kilovoltage X-ray radiotherapy, and as such, should be useful for quality control and manufacturing of components in such machines.There is more to be optimistic about than just how well a team did in the national championship game. Rather, there is something to be optimistic about every year when it comes to e79caf774b
