Â .Expert reviewers from the National Institute for Health and Care Excellence (NICE) have recommended that people with bipolar disorder should not be prescribed certain antidepressants, following reports that they can trigger or worsen bipolar symptoms. NICE's review, published in the British Medical Journal, was prompted by a large number of cases of people with bipolar disorder, who were inappropriately given antidepressants at the same time as their symptoms were worsening. Antidepressants include the most commonly prescribed class of medicine for treating mental health problems, but the largest study of people with bipolar to date found that almost half of those receiving antidepressant drugs were taking them at a time when they knew or should have known that their mental health was deteriorating. Instead of antidepressants, NICE recommends that patients should be given antimanics, a class of medicine that includes lithium. The group said a combination of the two medicines might be helpful in some patients, and antidepressants that are better tolerated in people with bipolar might be effective.
