To start viewing messages, select the forum that you want to visit from the selection below. And yet, people are buying things without clicking a button or playing a video. They interact socially without knowing they are. They buy stuff without knowing they are in fact availing a product, and marketing is a vital part of this. I'm not of course in favor of any overt 'sell' message, but before commenting that an actor shouldn't interact or wear makeup in a product-related commercial, you can see Star Trek II: The Wrath of Khan for instance with the physio-gym montage. It's extremely effective, not just because of the doctor playing the lead, but because a product is being advertised. I think this applies to other mediums as well, and it doesn't mean selling in a way you disapprove of. Also, of course there's a difference between active role-playing and passive use of the product. Shouldn't it be up to the consumer whether they act like a hero with awesome gear or not? I'm pretty sure it's mostly an extreme example. If a 12 year old daughter says "I want to go to Chicago this summer to see the dolphins", that's obviously an extreme example, but I'm pretty sure her parents didn't say "Here, have your daughter be a dolphin for two weeks, then throw her into the ocean and be damned. It's kinda contrary to her wishes, alright? She never, not once, will have the chance to change her mind - you say no, and she has no recourse to go into human form and swap bodies." Now you're definitely crossing the line, but in most ads, the parents work their butts off to ensure their daughters like what they get into the summer, and the little girl doesn't know what's going to happen. I don't think that their kids are having sex with dolphins, but I do think they are being groomed for this type of environment. Unless I'm misreading something, I think this is a bit of a misconception. Most advertisers don't want their ads to be used as toys for children to play with, just as I don't want my ads to be used

The present invention relates to automated systems for loading and unloading cargo and, more particularly, to automated systems for loading and unloading cargo in the nosewheel well of ships. During the process of loading and unloading cargo on ships, it is necessary to store the cargo in the hold of the ship where it is kept during the voyage. In the course of loading and unloading operations, the ships may be docked at various ports along the way. In order to avoid the overhead costs of maintaining a warehouse and the shipment of goods and services from one location to another, it is sometimes more economical to store the goods directly on the deck of the ship. In the past, cargo was loaded and unloaded from ships by means of a ramp. In this operation, the cargo container was first lowered to the deck of the ship. Next, a ramp was positioned alongside the ship, and the containers were rolled onto the ramp. After all the containers were loaded, the ramp was rolled up and the containers were lowered to the hold of the ship. An example of this type of system is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 3,788,705, entitled "Railway Loading Apparatus", issued to B. Desplanque on Jan. 29, 1974. One problem that arises in the operation of this prior art system is that it is difficult to ensure that the containers will roll directly onto the ramp and will roll off the ramp in a parallel manner with respect to the ramp. If the container is improperly loaded or improperly placed on the ramp, and, as a result, is not parallel to the ramp, the containers will tip over in a variety of directions. In the past, this problem was remedied by using an expensive and complicated load control system. An example of such a load control system is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 2,726,425, entitled "Pneumatic Shuttle Control System for Transferring Vertical Loads", issued to W. A.
