SOCKS5 was not designed to be a full-blown replacement for a network stack, but rather to allow a computer with an interface that has no access to a routable network to connect to another computer which does have network access and send/receive data over that connection as if that another computer had the same interface. It does this by creating a tunnel between the two computers by setting up a connection that transparently flows through whatever access-restricted network the SOCKS5 proxy is on. How does SOCKS5 save the username and password for the next connection attempt, since it is not even running on the same computer? A: SOCKS relays your traffic through a separate network, tunneling it through the remote servers which you would have connected to. In the SOCKS5 protocol, both sides know their username and password. They use this to authenticate with the remote server. G.M. Thomas, and D. Kopf, Phys. Rev. Lett. [108]{}, 093901 (2012). H. Hang, S. Zhang, C.A. Diez, T.C.H. Liew, Y.Y. Zhu, D.E. Chang, and A.J. This week is pretty much all work and no play for me. I am not a procrastinator and I hate feeling behind in my work, but I am stuck due to my hard ex colleagues, and the state of my water heater. We are in the midst of remodeling with new duct work and a central water heater. The work started on Sunday and has been going on around the clock since. Our new water heater is in the back of our master bathroom and it's taking an absolute nip and tuck to keep it from bursting into flames. In the mean time, all I've been doing is cleaning the lounge and reading. Here is a freebie for today: T & E4 Shades (FREE) A little of sass on these shades The TandE4 Shades are made by Julep's direct links for $26.00 and can be purchased on their website. I think they are a very pretty shade and would be ideal for a dark themed nursery. They also come with a really nice magnetic rod for you to hang them on. These shades will be up for grabs next week as you can send in an email request and be notified. I would love to add them to this month's issue of A Brighter Minded Mommy. Please keep in mind that these shades are free, but if you purchase the shades through my link, I receive a small commision. We all need a little extra cash, that being said, it will not be noticeable because our advertising cost is covered by Julep. Here is a little
