We have moved an application to a different server. The reason for moving it was to take advantage of the newer hardware available, increase the number of users that the application can support and reduce the processing load. This has involved moving the application from its older server onto a new server, and installing all the software updates. The app does not have any extensive DBA functionality, and the app runs within IIS with some custom ASP.net code. I have checked both servers have the same site bindings and app pool settings. There is no firewall blocking web traffic on the new server. This has been going on for over a month, with increasing users. The users connecting to the application are only talking to data not interacting with the application. It appears to be the case that the app has fallen back to a 'cycling' pattern with regards to the session connections, and hence timing out if the session times out. For example every 20 seconds it checks if the session is still connected, and if it is, whether it is an 'unused' session, thus not making any call to the database. If the session times out it then moves on to the next session in the list, if there are
