All TechSmith Authoring Software are released as authorized products of the respective TechSmith Authoring Software Developers. service that helps customers find an agent who is qualified to service their specific vehicle and issue. Why does Tesla keep switching agents to try to gain the most sales? Makes me wonder if Tesla pays per call and then they need to switch agent just like any other business.

Sam said: August 3, 2018 at 10:41 am No. Tesla is not in the car business. Tesla is in the luxury car business. The Model S, X and 3 are not in the luxury car business. The Model 3 is in the luxury/affordable car business. This is why Tesla has no dealership in the United States. The company is completely dependent on the public for sales. To date, they have sold more Tesla vehicles than any other automaker in the United States. They have no dealers and they do not want to become a dealership just like the only other automaker in the United States, GM. Tesla does not need a dealership. They just need people to buy their cars and Tesla does that through advertising. The company created an account on their website and a customer can buy an electric vehicle, no dealership needed. I bought my Model S in 2014. Spare_Me said: August 3, 2018 at 10:57 am I called them last week and had 3 sales people that started talking to me. They ended up transferring me to 2 more departments which ended in me not getting any help
