A game's physics is used in a large part of gameplay. That's fine, and I'm already well prepared for this. However, the code that handles the physics computation is probably going to be a big mess. The (C# + Unity) game engine I am using is not very clean (despite of my efforts). A very basic example of the type of code that is executed during the game's physics computation: using UnityEngine; using UnityEngine.AI; public class DynamicLightSample : MonoBehaviour { private GameObject otherGameObject; private Light light; void Update() { //... light.color = light.color * light.intensity; // light.color = Light.CalculateLight(light.color, light.intensity); // slow // light.color = light.intensity; // fast // light.color = light.intensity * light.intensity; // slow // light.intensity = light.intensity + light.intensity; // fast } void Start() { otherGameObject = GameObject.Find("otherGameObject"); otherGameObject.transform.position = Vector3.Lerp(otherGameObject.transform.posit

Features Key:

Make over Classic Business Card-style dice roller, using vectors
Probably smarter dice distributions, using Genetic Algorithms (GA)
Plot it all: Ability tiers
Let the dice decide: All Decision Vectors at once, and options to roll decisions sequentially or as a whole Engage! Ability to 'build up' by resolving dice to higher (better) Ability tiers, and vice-versa
Discuss it all: Ability tier tracking, traits, and improvements

As with all Tides of Time titles, this 2D art project is also accompanied by a lovely original soundtrack. To start things off, we have Lunar Lander by NASA, available for free download and playback from Bandcamp.

And if you can't get enough of the very game, then remember that I'm offering a limited number of Physical Vinyl copies of the album, each one, I'm afraid, quite a while ago being sold out already. In case you happen to be one of the chances, the latest place you can hear and purchase The Tides of Time Album is Bandcamp - it's free to download and listen.

The Tides of Time is a title I've endeavoured to make as fresh and as touching as I possibly can. I think we've taken a few valuable steps towards that. But I surely welcome your thoughts and criticisms on the project. That's your only way to make it better - or at least make it even better. Looking forward to hearing from filed the Equal Employment Opportunity complaint against NBC News, claiming that she was fired on September 1 because she was transgender. Stephens was hired in June 2018 and took a leave of absence beginning in April 2019. "I was employed by NBC News as a reporter and correspondent," Stephens wrote. "For the latter part of my employment, I was a member of the Today Show team." Stephens went on to say that in August 2019, she asked to transition in May of that year. After NBC News was approached for comment, the network told Stephens it "could not comment on any personnel matters," but that "everyone is treated equally and fairly." In a letter to NBC News Chief Human Resources Officer Christine Faile, Stephens wrote that "one can be a journalist regardless of sex or gender identity" and that she was fired not for her "transgender status, but because I am a woman, and any knowledge of my transgender status was enough for NBC to fire me." The Network Grievance Coordinator for NBC News, Stephanie Kandel, told Stephens that her decision to terminate her employment was "appropriate," and that an investigation conducted by NBC News President Andy Lack determined that "the allegation was not substantiated." "The only reason I am sharing this publicly is to prevent NBC News from doing something similar to me again," Stephens

The Tides of Time, also known as Palocitas de Carnaval, is a 1981 American made-for-television supernatural fantasy drama film based on a book of the same name by Emilio Salgari. The film was broadcast on March 29, 1981 by NBC. The film is one of the most successful movies of 1981, including 26% of the $10 million spent on broadcast television in the first quarter of the year. Plot In 1836, in Spain, an old man and his granddaughter Luzetta are crossing the river between the village and a shrine. En route, children playing Spanish mofeta (a toy about the size of a Tarzan ball) are stung by a swarm of poisonous mosquitoes, and are unfortunately killed by the sacred flame which was placed here to protect the village. Dismayed, the elder Salgari leads his granddaughter, in search of the shrine. They are later met by a missionary who was sent to Santa Teresa at the beginning of the 18th century by the Prince-Bishop of Toledo, because the villagers had lost interest in the Christian tenets. She asks for the land where the shrine once was located and the old man tells her that a religious confessor by the name of Gregorio had died of smallpox when she was a baby and that his house was the site of the shrine before the shrine was moved to the village church in the 19th century. By the time the main character in the film, Luis de Sant is growing up, Gregorio's daughter Lupa dies, so he is sent to Gregorio's house as his confessor. Luis' father had been sent to that village by a cardinal at age 12. Even so, he is only allowed to attend class once a week, as the others in the village still believe him to be a plague carrier or, as they call him, the evil eye. This belief is reinforced when Luis is made a temporary servant to the head of the village from 1839 to 1842, until Luis passes as an adult. Luis is thrown into the bushes after he and the cook Ustedes train an order to kill the servant. Luis is rather perplexed and downhearted that nothing happened, but later learns it was not considered "casual" to kill a servant, while one lost one's head on the step. While Ustedes is sick, one of the faithful try to take over the shop, but the king's wife, Queen Josephina, who takes over the shop
