Operators applied to the Board for special permission, from July 1, to use emergency lane openings in the RAC, to carry out preventative maintenance, made it clear that their principal concern would be congestion management. A congestion management system is a traffic management system which removes particular lanes from the traffic network. An example of a system which would be consistent with the operators' concerns is the Full Stoppage Lane (FSL) system, which has been used successfully in the UK for several years. If implemented in the RAC, such a system would allow the frequency of emergency lane openings to be reduced. One of the operators' main concerns is about the costs of implementing a congestion management system. It has estimated that costs for a single HRT would be around £10,000, but that costs could be spread across all the lines that share the same track. The Board was told that the operators had not drawn up a full business case. The Board voted that if the operator application was well founded and consistent with the traffic management policies in the RAC strategic plan, the Board would give it a favourable hearing. The Board said that it would use its discretion to be more lenient if a congestion management system was considered to be at the end of the viability range and that if a full business case was not submitted it would not be considered. Chairman Claire Gardham said that the Board would use that discretion.

Q: Trying to create a bouncing ball that stops when the user pushes it I'm trying to create a bouncing ball, the ball moves up and down until the user pushes it and then stops. The problem is when I release the ball, the ball stops so fast that it makes a "thock" sound and it doesn't move any further. This is the code I have so far: `int isDrawn = 0; if (isDrawn == true) { ballX += 1; if (ballX == -38) {`

: Who Really Makes A Difference For Animals? July 14, 2016 What role do humans play in the lives of animals? It's easy to agree that animals are important, and most of us would agree that saving and protecting them makes a difference in the world and in people's lives. This question is becoming increasingly relevant to students of animal welfare and natural history. It is even more relevant to those who love animals and want to help their survival. "Gather ye rosebuds while ye may, Old time is still a-flying." After thousands of years, human beings have suddenly ended the world as most know it. Faced with an immediate need, what are we going to do? We have, almost overnight, become the new "Natural Selector." While people, plants and animals are all in danger, humans as a species seem to be at even greater risk of extinction. That makes everything we humans do, including our relationship with animals, extremely important in the struggle for survival. Let us look carefully and honestly at our role in the world in relation to animals, and how, in a short time, we have disrupted everything that was. Since the beginning of the human race the world has always been changing. This is the life cycle of nature. The world had everything This world was perfect. Animals, plants and everything in nature was in harmony with itself and with other animals. It was a perfect balance, just as we look at it today in the world of the universe in our galaxy. Without any doubt, we are part of this perfect picture. We did not and do not, and shall never exist as islands, cut off from the rest of the natural world. We are part of the world. Our globe and our life cycle We have come a long way. For starters, we live in a different environment. This includes a completely different climate, a completely different world, and a different way of life. The world of the year 200 A.D., or the year A.D. 1604, had a completely different climate, in which animals and plants no longer existed. For example, Greenland had ice thousands of feet below the surface of the sea - there were no animals or plants and no snow! Historians and archivists are now able to see in this new soil everything that was alive in the world
