computational approach to the initial stimulation of the enzyme fumarase in the rat hippocampus. We have previously described that the enzyme fumarase in the hippocampus of the rat is rapidly stimulated by high doses of amphetamine, giving rise to a biphasic stimulation pattern. Therefore, we propose a computational approach to the initial stimulation of this enzyme during the acute administration of drugs. A three-state model for the enzyme fumarase, with two conformational substates and an open (O) and closed (C) state, is used. The dynamics of the kinetics parameters such as the binding constant and the energy barrier of the transition OC were estimated by microcalorimetry and a sequential treatment for the occurrence of the transitions O-C and C-O. A two-state model is used to describe the changes in the affinity constant and the energy barriers during the stimulation of the enzyme. The fits of the experimental data obtained for 1, 3, 5 and 10 mg/kg of an i.p. administration of an amphetamine-like drug (m-CPP) allowed us to estimate a single O $\rightarrow$ C transition, which corresponds to the initial stimulation of the enzyme. The validity of the approach has also been tested using a central administration of dopamine, which produces a monophasic stimulation of the enzyme. The main conclusion of our studies, is that the initial stimulation of the fumarase does not require the occurrence of any type of conformational changes in the enzyme. We are now in the process of exploring the possibility of using this information to
