The metabolism of doxorubicin in human and rat lung. The metabolism of doxorubicin was investigated in human and rat lung. Using 14C-doxorubicin (500 microM) the following differences were observed between the two species: in man, approximately 60% of the drug was retained after a 60 min incubation; in rat, approximately 20%; in both cases a portion of the drug was excreted into the lung wash. While the uptake of drug was similar in both species in vitro, in the presence of 100 microM cycloheximide the rates of uptake of doxorubicin by human and rat lung slices were reduced by 50 and 95%, respectively. The intracellular retention of the drug was investigated in rat lung slices. It was found to decrease dramatically with time in the presence of the drug. In vitro, doxorubicin metabolism by both lung and liver slices from both species was similar. Approximately 80% of the drug was converted to doxorubicinol by rat lung slices while only approximately 20% was metabolized by the human lung slices. In vitro, the total amount of doxorubicinol present in incubations containing human or rat lung slices was similar. However, in lung slices from both species, incubation with 4 microM doxorubicin resulted in the formation of greater amounts of doxorubicinol than incubations containing 4 microM doxorubicin plus 100 microM cycloheximide. These data suggest that not only doxorubicin, but also doxorubicinol can be metabolized by rat lung slices.
