According to Dr Kerry McDonald, who chaired the study, about half of these patients ask whether they really do need psychiatric treatment. "The study is a reflection of the extraordinary growth of the internet and how quickly things are changing," said Dr McDonald. "If neurosurgery patients start having these conversations about their mental health, then there will be a dramatic increase in people getting help from doctors." The report concluded that more doctors should make electronic referrals to patient advocacy service Mind in the UK, where patients are free to receive free diagnostic testing and psychotherapy. The study also revealed that doctors could even recommend their patients to be given an informal consultation on the internet. The survey, carried out by the Surgical Neurology Society in the USA, found that 12% of doctors had referred a patient to a psychiatrist, and 32% had referred a patient to a psychological therapist. But only 25% of doctors had referred a patient to a psychopharmacologist. Dr McDonald commented that doctors should make referrals to the National Health Service's Get Psych. About two million people in the UK are thought to have a diagnosable psychological disorder. "The quicker these referrals are made, the sooner patients receive the kind of diagnosis they're looking for," he said. "By the time a patient gets referred to a psychiatrist by a doctor, he or she has probably been waiting a long time for an appointment." This can also lead to patients suffering from major mental disorders, such as schizophrenia or depression, becoming more unwell by the time they finally receive help, a fact that people such as 0cc13bf012
