+0000>The present invention relates generally to the field of electrical connectors and, more particularly, to a female electrical connector that includes a latch for engaging one or more male connectors. It is well known in the electrical connector art to employ a rotational male connector with a female connector to establish electrical contact therebetween. The contacts are retained in the female connector by internal latching structures which catch complimentary structure of the male connector to retain the male connector in the female connector. For ease of installation, the male connector is often rotatably mounted on the female connector body. U.S. Pat. No. 5,304,998 discloses such a male connector having a rotatable end portion provided with a telescopically movable latch extending from the body of the male connector end portion and pointing radially inwardly toward the female connector. The latch has a pair of opposing ends having latching fingers projecting toward one another. In order to catch and retain the latch on the female connector, the male and female connectors are inserted with the latch projecting forwardly toward an open end of the female connector. As the male and female connectors are pushed toward one another, the fingers enter the channel formed by the female connector body. As the male and female connectors are further pushed toward one another, the fingers enter the clearance formed by the female connector body. The latch can be rotated and the fingers spring outwardly into retaining engagement with the female connector. As will be discussed in more detail below, such a rotational connection is not suitable for many applications. Moreover, the provision of a rotary latch greatly increases the size of the connector. Reduction of oxidative stress by resveratrol and its protective mechanisms in the rat brain and cerebral vasculature. Oxidative damage contributes to multiple pathologies, including ischemic stroke and vascular dementia in the aging brain. Resveratrol (RES), a polyphenolic compound present in grapes and red wine, exerts antioxidant, anti-inflammatory, and anti-apoptotic effects.
