Q: Does Android have a daemon that you can use to detect out-of-memory conditions? I am developing a splash screen for my app which displays for a while, and then calls a "quit" function. The idea is that a daemon will run in the background checking for memory conditions (out of memory etc.), and, when the conditions are met, the daemon will call the quit function. However, the above doesn't really answer the question of how to detect out-of-memory conditions. I think I have figured it out now. I think it goes something like this: In my `SplashScreenService` class, I'm setting up a `HandlerThread` that runs in the background using a `WorkerThread`. I am registering a `BroadcastReceiver` with this `HandlerThread` so that, in the event of out-of-memory conditions, it notifies the splash screen to shut down (and, if the out-of-memory condition is not a RAM overflow - memory heap
