I installed light-locker and do not want to use gnome-screensaver (I have opted for light-locker). I do understand that light-locker checks if the user has their mouse still, and if so, it tells light-locker to un-lock the screen. My question is how does light-locker know that the mouse is still? How is this system implemented? A: You can find the source code and build instructions for light-locker here. The script that does the timer and if still-mouse-case runs as root is located at /etc/X11/Xsession.d/91light-locker-sudo. The script itself is written to be as interactive as possible. If the running mode (either --sleep-locked-screen or --lock-and-unlock) is too long, the mouse is moved and if that happens, it is assumed that the lock is gone and the script returns. The script is built on top of lightdm-command-not-found to lookup the user for the session. of this marker.
