"Our research has shown that an average player needs to make between 20 and 25 high-intensity actions in a 90-minute match," said technical director Matt Prior. "Our goal was to deliver a game that remains fast but also has true-to-life physicality. We've taken many of the elements from previous versions of the game and added more technology into gameplay. "Our goal was to make a game that is fun to play as a goalkeeper, but also rewarding to play as a midfielder. Players will experience more collisions, more detailed ball-control, and more attacking options. We are confident that this game will be your next goalkeeping and midfield simulator." Revised dribble system The original FIFA gameplay introduced the dribble (aka Twist) system, where players could perform a 180-degree spin on the ball to create distance. The dribble feature has had a positive reception, with players identifying the dribble as a fun, tactical move. The new version of dribble is called the "Bull Rush," where the player has to specifically run to the ball while being in an attacking position before making a jump-dribble. If the player is in the correct position, the player can fly over the defense with the ball without any of the setbacks that plagued the original dribble system. "The Bull Rush was first discussed at E3 in 2015 and it was planned that we would start the development process in Spring 2017," said sound designer Nathan Perez. "We started in the middle of 2017 and have been implementing the system into the game so that players can be as familiar with the new dribble as possible." With the new dribble, players can pass the ball to the player running through the "passing lane" with no combination of button presses. Instead, a simple pass with the right analog stick sends the ball to a specific player. "In the original dribble, we were trying to create a system that would have players take full advantage of the creativity of the three-dimensional space that video games are built upon," said Perez. "But after reading the feedback from the community, we decided that this new dribble system should be a simpler, more accessible and fun system for players to use." FIFA 22 introduces the "Evade" feature, allowing the player to use the right
