The first thing to do in Photoshop is make sure the background is black. If you have a gray background, it makes it much harder to see where the tool's magic happens when you're adding and removing pixels and making other changes to the image. * * * A few other terms will come up in the following Photoshop chapter: • Kerning: The spacing between letters on a line of text. • CMYK: Also known as the four-color process or the cyan, magenta, yellow, and black process; it enables the reproduction of the full range of colors on color printers. • Black and white: An image in black and white has no color information. • RGB: Also known as the red, green, and blue process; it refers to how the standard screen colors are being represented in the image. The RGB system produces the greatest range of light and shadow, and it's the most common way to display color on a computer screen. • RGB and CMYK: Use of the RGB and CMYK systems while editing an image is becoming more common. • RGB Photoshop: The latest version of the RGB file format that allows you to edit and re-edit RGB images. • Transparency: An image made up of layers. When a layer is "transparent," it lets light through and shows or hides a different layer below it. * * * ## Building a New Beginning The image shown in Figure 1-1 is on a sheet of translucent copy paper. It's a contact sheet of images that were shot by a friend of mine, a professional wedding photographer. It's a great portfolio piece that I will be using in this book to explain some basic techniques to help my readers have better photographs. Figure 1-1: The contact sheet of images. | --- | --- When you begin to create a new document in Photoshop you have access to many different types of photos you can use for the subject. You can try using only the original image for the most basic shot, or you can try experimenting with a variety of different techniques that may help you improve the image even further.

1. Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to railway tank cars and the manufacture thereof, and more specifically to the manufacture of railroad tank cars having an outer shell with an outer end portion defining a gap therebetween. 2. Background Information The Canadian National Railway Company has a production facility at Waterloo, Ontario, Canada which manufactures several railway tank cars. These tank cars consist of an outer shell mounted on a carbody. The shell provides a sealed chamber or compartment into which various products may be transported. These tank cars are manufactured by welding two shell halves together into a shell body with a gap or hollow portion between the shell halves. When manufactured by the CNRC, the railway tank cars are painted, then stored in a "spare parts" yard. Thereafter, the entire shell (including the shell gap) is brought to a treatment facility for the application of a liner, also referred to as a secondary paint coating. (The outer shell is also referred to as a "topcoat" which is finished with a lacquer, rather than a paint.) The gaps in the shell are filled in with metal, to present a smooth and continuous outer surface to the railway tank car. To prevent the steel from sticking to the liner, the liner applied over the shell gap is made from a liner tape (approximately 0.032 inch thick) which has been etched to expose adhesive on the upper surface. The etch process removes the barrier layer protecting the adhesive from the metal surfaces, thus allowing the adhesive to stick to the metal surfaces. The type of liner tape used for filling the gaps in the outer shell is P/N 5018. Although the adhesive is preferably protected by a liner tape, it is not critical. The preferred material for making the liner tape is an unadhesive area of a layer of polyolefin such as a polyethylene. The liner is typically applied to the outer shell of the railway tank car in an area of approximately 60% to 90% of the car's length. The adhesive is then pressed to a portion of the liner tape which extends beyond the gap, and the liner tape is cut at the edge of the gap. The tape is then trimmed, centered, and heated to cure the adhesive. After the adhesive has cured, the liner tape is removed from the railway tank car by peeling. Thereafter, a secondary paint is applied to the outer surface of the shell to seal the gap and complete the railway tank car. There are a number of problems with the conventional method of
