Take Aim at Lawsuit-Fearing Texas Lawmakers Fear the state's tough new law will put them on the wrong side of a big lawsuit over funding for abortion providers HOUSTON, Texas -- Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott's office is expected to file its own court brief this week in what's anticipated to be a major abortion funding case, after more lawmakers took aim at the state's new law curbing abortions. Lawmakers on the Texas House and Senate's "special" legislative session questioned whether the law was constitutional, saying it is effectively giving the state attorney general the power to decide what health care providers can and can't do in the name of protecting "life." "Should a court in a jurisdiction that is within the United States of America look to a law enacted by a home rule municipality?" asked state Sen. Donna Campbell, R-New Braunfels, of the Planned Parenthood lawsuit, which could cost the state $100 million. "What's the difference?" That's a dramatic increase from the $50,000 the state is already spending, according to Austin-based attorney Doug Wilker, who is representing Planned Parenthood. Campbell's fellow Republican, state Rep. Shawn Thierry, R-Houston, argued
