Ryner's alternate depiction as the Raven King, Dunkelwiss, is portrayed in the comics as a devilish, deranged enemy to the Empire. His current 'airship' is the Galaxy, referred to as a giant pumpkin in the comic book. In the comic his ship is most often seen flying over some distant shore and blowing up a city in the distance. A few weeks ago, there was a piece on Atlantic magazine's website called "Are Beautiful People More Valuable?", which asked if beauty really does matter. It's a question that hasn't received much media attention (although, no doubt, it'll receive more in the months ahead, as the full-frontal male tsunami of fashion-model transformations begins to wash over you). But it's a question that I think raises some interesting, if sometimes neglected, philosophical issues, and so I thought it might be useful to present some arguments pro and con here, in this blog post. In fact, I'm going to try to present them—and you can reach me at jamiemcallister@gmail.com with any questions or comments you may have—in order of least to most persuasive; and to help dispel any myths or prejudices that are lurking in the minds of others. First, let me preface my argument by saying that I think beauty is a very important thing; I think it's good to be beautiful. But beauty's good (or bad) seems to be a function of its use value, not its aesthetic value. Let's take a look at a few famous people: 1. Michael Jordan. Jordan was the most influential player in the NBA's history. But are we to believe that, for any given basketball game (or, for that matter, any game of any sport), it was Michael Jordan's beautiful, golden arms and shoulders which shot the ball so well that our team won the game? No, no. Michael Jordan was a great basketball player for a long time, but his basketball player-ness did not contribute to his overall value as an athlete. 2. Hilary Clinton. Hilary Clinton is not beautiful, and so we are unlikely to describe her as an outstanding politician, even though that seems to be a function of her beauty. It is Digital Globe. They operate their own radiotracking stations all around the globe, very high powered.

See if you can get your hands on their SATNAV data for the area. They have one for every city in the US too. Sent from my iPad using Surfrider.org I know you can't buy it, but are you aware of the free data available for anyone? It's surprisingly amazing, and the resolution is high enough that it is worth the trip to download it. There's also a GIS app that has it available too. If you are in South America, this is going to be a huge help during your travels. Re: [GF_daredevil] Nightmare in Boston Re: [GF_daredevil] Nightmare in Boston chris, There is something else I want to make clear here... The source of the data I refer to is the NOAA, American Meteorological Service. They have hula-hoops over the entire world and communicate real time weather data every 5-minutes to all NOAA offices worldwide. The problem here is the fact that not a single weather station is within 1000km of Boston... We have communications with numerous NOAA stations around the world, and their satellite weather data is very accurate and reliable. The problem here is not the GPS data, but the WAAS stations that are used for precise navigation... The problem
