I am developing a C++ software package in a private Debian repository. The package is made available to everyone who wants to use it. But to simplify the package a bit, I will distribute an example package. This example package will be used as a tutorial to use the software, and be available for people who want to use it. How do I create an example package for a GPLv2 project? Should I use a different repository and create a custom package to add to it? Or is there a way to make this possible inside the Debian repository? A: Are you willing to add a directory to your source code repository that contains the example package? If you do this, just add a single file with the name of your package and documentation; for example, my-test-pkg.pkg. There are two ways to achieve this: Use the make-extras script to create the corresponding Debian package. If you are unfamiliar with this process, go to the Debian Wiki and read How to create a Debian package from source for a general introduction. That page also has a link to instructions that show how to use make-extras. Before you begin, be sure to start a bug report so that other users can benefit from your work. Add the directory to your source control. Create a directory. Place a makefile in the directory, and tell make to
