As a former long-time Dragon Quest owner, I was intrigued to see how Tarnished would play in comparison. After four years waiting for the return of everyone’s favorite hero, Tales of Berseria looks to be the closest we’ll get to a remake of the beloved JRPG. The initial impression I get from Tales of Berseria is that it’s a spiritual successor to the acclaimed Dragon Quest series. The visual style is reminiscent of Dragon Quest VIII in terms of character design and animations, so naturally, there are areas of comparison throughout. In regards to the battle system, there is a slight deviation from the Dragon Quest series in that characters can swap weapon types without leaving the field. Meaning, if a character is using an axe and gets an opportunity to swap to a sword, they can do so without immediately losing their axe. While this may seem minor, it does change how the game is approached. There are a few other noticeable changes to combat. One of these is that the majority of the enemies are no longer the typical enemies found in Dragon Quest VIII. There are now smaller enemies, including crab-like creatures and small spiders. This makes certain fights seem more varied, as instead of just being able to easily defeat a bad guy, you now have to think about how to take on the smaller, more agile foes. That said, battles remain very similar. The major change in Tales of Berseria is in the story. Berseria, which roughly translates to “Beryl’s Journey,” focuses on a group of people trying to uncover the mystery of the Dark Elf Beryl. However, the narrative of the story picks up where it left off in Dragon Quest VIII. These events, including Beryl’s origins, even back to when she was seen as a slave in the beginning of the game. When talking about the story, it’s clear there has been a lot of time put into it. While this might seem strange to see in a JRPG, it’s a feature that is necessary to see in one if it’s attempting to live up to its predecessors. Maybe it’s just me, but I prefer the stories of Dragon Quest VIII and the original Dragon Quest to those seen in later games. While I enjoyed the stories in Dragon Quest XI and XIV, there was simply nothing there that I felt was an extension of the Dragon Quest Saga. As bff6bb2d33

A customer is waiting in line to buy a product, when he meets a fellow customer inside the store. As there are no more customers in the store, he gets right to the sales counter to speak with someone. While waiting, the first customer decides to leave the store and prepare his shopping list on his smartphone. When the second customer reaches the sales counter he says, “Let’s go to my smartphone. It’s easier that way.” The first customer isn’t convinced, but after taking a look at the options, he leaves the store. The user is an employee at Amazon Japan, and even though he’s Japanese he mastered English well enough that he could inform customers about his offer. Amazon opened its first state-of-the-art store in Ginza in 2014. The three-story Amazon Ginza is divided into two types of floor areas: the main one and the gallery. The main floor is used in the peak hours of the day for customer service work and reservations. All floors are laid out in a corridor layout, with customer waiting rooms on the left and the sales counters on the right. The sales counters have a glass front and a convenience-oriented display of products. In the middle, between the sales counter and the waiting room, is the gallery where visitors can view the products in the display cases on the wall.

Customers wait in the various floors to receive services. In the main floor, their waiting is done in booths.

First, they wait in the waiting room. They choose which customer service counter they want to handle the service based on the time of the day. For example, customer service will begin on the first floor from 10.00 a.m. to 11.00 a.m. At the counter, they hand over their Amazon ID card with the printed label encoded with the necessary user ID and password. After the system identifies the user’s account ID, it writes the reference number on the ID card. Then, the authorized
