Ontario MPPs are having a tough time with the provincial Liberal-led government's new pension plan. MPPs have warned that many of them, who make less than $150,000 a year, will be forced to drop coverage under the new plan, called Ontario Retirement Pension Plan, if they vote against it. If the Liberals get their way, average MPPs' pay will be increased nearly $100,000. But they have to admit that a huge chunk of that money will come from the pension, so it will be difficult to explain why they are voting against the plan that will lower their pension benefits. "I'm a little bit under $150,000 a year. And let me say, I'm a small businesswoman. And the only way I can support my family is through my pension, and I want to see what happens to that," said Catherine Hawkins, the former Liberal MPP for Durham, said Wednesday. Under the new plan, which was unveiled by the Liberals last month, MPPs will be required to contribute 1.45% of their salary to the OTPP, as opposed to 0.8%, as is the case now. MPPs' pension was modified in the last two years, increasing the rate of contribution to 1.4% from 1.5%, although they haven't had to pay the full cost yet. Now, for the first time, they have to contribute a full 1.45% of their pay. The additional money will come from clawing back a proportion of their pay, using what is described as a clawback calculator. Currently, the cost is split between MPPs and the government. The Liberals are proposing that it will be shared between the two, with MPPs making up four-fifths of the costs. The OTPP will be paid for by MPPs, the government and the province's two largest cities. The government's share is calculated to cost MPPs $440 million annually, over the next two decades. The
