Autodesk Industrial Infra's Autodesk Simulation Moldflow Insight 2010 Crack.Q: Python: Google App Engine returning new value from a function Is it possible for a python function to return a new value? I am writing a script which needs to run every minute, and if it finds a new instance it should check some variables about it. If no new instance has been created in the last minute the script should return a new value. A: You could write a function returning a class (aka dict or list with some property having the value of a new value), that you set when you perform an action and when the function is called it checks for the new value. Update after clarification: One solution is not to have an attribute as new value, but use a global, and check it everytime: example: new_value = None def check_variable(x): if new_value!= None: return new_value new_value = x def check_other_var(x): if new_value == None: return x else: return new_value And the check_other_var is called by the first one, and by the scheduler. But I'd rather use a
