Because the real crime that you committed was the misquoting of the girl itself; Autoimmune hepatitis and pregnancy outcome: A systematic review. Autoimmune hepatitis (AIH) is a chronic disease that occurs most commonly in women of childbearing age. Pregnancy in AIH has deleterious effects on maternal and fetal health. To summarize the epidemiology, clinical features, and prognosis of AIH during pregnancy. We searched the MEDLINE, Cochrane, Embase, and Wanfang databases from inception to January 2018. Studies were included when: (1) they were observational studies that reported on women with AIH; (2) they included a diagnosis of AIH in pregnancy; (3) they reported clinical and/or laboratory data related to AlH in pregnancy, and (4) they reported on the fetal or neonatal outcome. Risk of bias was assessed using the Newcastle-Ottawa Scale. Quality assessment was performed by two reviewers independently (S.J.W. and B.J.Y.). No trials that met our inclusion criteria were found. Twenty-four studies, representing seven countries, with a total of approximately 1,000 women, were identified. The prevalence of AIH in pregnancy varied between 0.9% and 10.5% (six studies: China, Canada, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, and the United States). The prevalence was highest in pregnant women with a history of fulminant hepatitis or hepatic failure and lowest in those without a history of these diseases. There was no difference in the risk of adverse pregnancy outcomes in women with AIH treated with or without immunosuppression, and treatment during pregnancy did not affect the type or severity of hepatitis. AIH in pregnancy was associated with higher pregnancy-related mortality and adverse pregnancy outcomes. The main limitations of this study were the small number of included studies and the absence of randomized, controlled trials. Further studies are needed to confirm these findings. body { font-family: sans-serif; } #outer { border-spacing: 0; } #col
