Probiotics, defined as 'live microorganisms which when administered in adequate amounts confer a health benefit on the host', have been extensively studied in humans for their ability to influence gut microbial composition and gastrointestinal health. A small number of studies have explored the influence of probiotic intake on the composition of the human microbiota in the absence of a disease state, but the evidence is limited and discrepant. Here, we assess short-term variation in faecal microbiota composition in response to dietary changes in healthy humans. This is a repeated, double-blind, placebo-controlled trial of a probiotic preparation, with stool collection and DNA extraction from faecal samples at days 2, 7 and 21 after a baseline sample, with no changes in diet. Changes in faecal microbiota composition were determined by 16S rRNA gene profiling, and compared using non-parametric tests. Eighteen of the 20 subjects completed the trial. A short-term increase in Faecalibacterium prausnitzii was detected following the probiotic intervention, suggesting an adaptation in microbiota composition to the supplementation. In addition, a significant decrease in Faecalibacterium prausnitzii was observed in the stool of a subset of subjects after an oral dose of antibiotics. We show that short-term changes in the microbiota of healthy volunteers are likely to be subtle and specific to the recipient and the intervention protocol and cannot be interpreted as the effect of the probiotic intervention alone. These data provide a reference point for future studies exploring the effect of more complex interventions on the microbiota.
