The objective of this proposal is to explore a novel mechanism for the control of biosynthesis of heparan sulfate (HS) proteoglycans (HSPG) in Drosophila melanogaster. HS serves a wide variety of biological functions in organisms ranging from microbes to humans. Recent studies have demonstrated the importance of HS in reproductive processes, such as fly wing and ovule development, muscle differentiation, axon guidance, and cell migration. Defects in HS biosynthesis and structure, together with defects in synthesis of HS-binding proteins, have been implicated in the development of cancer and neurodegenerative disease. The production of these HS-containing molecules in insects is controlled, in part, by a single gene family of seven genes, designated hs-1 to hs-7. In Drosophila, mutant alleles of hs are unique in that they result in the production of abundant HSPG lacking a central domain of the HS chain. These types of structures are structurally and functionally distinct from HS that is present in vertebrate cell cultures, where any changes in HS chain structure are associated with increased (or decreased) chain size and/or variation in the sulfation pattern of the GlcNAc6S residue. Our long term goal is to elucidate the mechanism by which HSPG biosynthesis is controlled in Drosophila using the tools of genetics, molecular biology, and biochemistry. We hypothesize that one or more of the hs genes is responsible for the biosynthesis of a specific domain of the HSPG. In Specific Aim 1, we will test our hypothesis by overexpression of different hs genes. If any of the genes are indeed involved in the biosynthesis of the central domain of the HSPG, then the overexpression of that gene should reduce the production of the central domain, which should result in the production of defective HS structures

These George Stevenson High School Bible Study Guides offer a great summary of the Bible with helpful charts that let you understand the Bible quickly and easily. With the increasing usage of computing networks, such as the Internet, humans are currently inundated and overwhelmed with the amount of information available to them from various structured and unstructured sources. However, information gaps abound as users try to piece together what they can find that they believe to be relevant during information searches for topics of interest. To help address this problem, recent research has been directed to generating natural language processing applications to glean the sentiment of online reviews to aid such searches. Some approaches to addressing these efforts generate a large set of documents related to a search query, but may not reflect the context within which such reviews were written. For example, if a review of a book reads “I hate the usage of the word hate in English language,” the review may be written in a formal or informal tone, which is not necessarily indicative of the sentiment of the reviewer from the book. Reviewer-provided review sentiments related to a book may be used to determine whether the review may be retrieved and/or used to categorize topics of interest to the reader. However, textual reviews alone may not be sufficient to evaluate the sentiment of reviewer-provided reviews of book, movies, or other items.

Other approaches to determining sentiment of reviewer-provided reviews may be limited to topical categories of a particular product, such as computer systems, home appliances, cell phones, televisions, consumer electronics, and the like.

Such approaches may also be limited to domains that are already heavily populated with reviews of such products. In some instances, the sentiment of reviewer-provided reviews may be determined by processes that consider a single phrase of text or word within the review. For example, a search engine or a user interface for receiving input of a review may prompt a user to select the phrase or word that is
