If you want to squeeze your way into a future where HTML and JavaScript become as powerful and as ubiquitous as the Internet itself, you'd better start thinking about coming up with another protocol for creating hypermedia applications. One such protocol, called link format, is just emerging as a candidate, and the work being done by its developers shows that it's possible. Currently, any Hypertext Markup Language document is represented as a stream of bytes, with each line of text on the page encoded as a sequence of bytes like this: This is the first line of text. This is the second line. Then, a web browser e79caf774b
