Due to the changing demographics of refugee and asylum seeking populations, there is a need to examine the health of refugees in contemporary contexts. To date, little research has focused on the refugee population in the United Kingdom (UK). The Refugee Health Questionnaire (RHQ) is a newly validated multidimensional health questionnaire specifically developed for the study of the health of refugees and asylum seekers within the UK. The primary aim of this study was to develop a contemporary exposure-based normative data for the RHQ using administrative data from the current health service. The sample comprised 1180 UK and EU nationals aged 18+ who had at least one UK-based outpatient medical appointment in the preceding 3 years. EFA was used to derive a two-factor solution, with Cronbach's alpha 0.70-0.89 for Factor 1 and 0.79-0.84 for Factor 2. Factor scores were calculated and descriptive statistics were derived and compared with previously available UK-based normative data generated from 1991 National Health Service data. Total scores from the present sample were broadly similar to those in the 1991 study, though there was less gender variability in scores. Comparison of the two factors showed different patterns of variation, with slightly higher scores for Factor 2 (emotional distress) but lower scores for Factor 1 (social distress). This was reflected in the scores for the sub-scales. The data presented provide contemporary exposure-based normative data for the UK for the RHQ and highlighted differences in the mean scores for each factor compared with the 1991 data. Further work is required to validate these findings, as well as assess the sensitivity of the RHQ to change over time in different sub-groups of UK asylum seekers and refugees.
