The present invention relates to telephone systems and more particularly to a high reliability telephone system having a computer aided telephone switching system. The telephone system of the present invention is a computer aided telephone switching system. A computer computer system may be used in data processing applications to process information. Data information is converted into electrical signals and transmitted to a telephone switching system. The signals in the voice circuit are converted back into electrical signals and transmitted to a computer system for processing and storing. The same data information may be stored in the computer system when there is not sufficient voice circuit capacity for a new call. The computer system is an intelligent system which analyzes the incoming information. In the present telephone switching system, several high reliability components are used, including the storage devices used to store data information and the ring-back circuitry. The storage device used to store incoming and outgoing telephone numbers, for instance, is on-off switchable. Ringing-back is a feature of the present telephone switching system which enables a busy telephone line to be "ringed" at the customer's telephone line. This enables incoming calls to be rerouted to an available telephone line. The telephone switching system uses the telephone line rings as the control signal to stop and start the switching process, and to store the incoming data. This system has increased reliability, uses a computer system for data processing and storage, is cost-effective, and is simple to maintain. Therefore, an object of the present invention is to provide a telephone system having increased reliability. Another object of the present invention is to provide a telephone system having a computer system for data processing and storage. Still another object of the present invention is to provide a telephone switching system having a computer system which analyzes the incoming information and stores new information on the computer system. Yet another object of the present invention is to provide a telephone system using the telephone line rings as the control signal for switching and as the data for storing incoming information. A further object of the present invention is to provide a telephone switching system which is cost-effective and simple to maintain.Autosomal missense mutations in mutant human peroxidas
