The time had come for my hat. I would crush it under the heel of my boot. I had to hide. The longer I sat, the more obviously I had to dig. It was the only way. I had to bury my emotions as deep as I could. I already had a target painted on my back. I didn't have much time. Wait! I could just pretend it wasn't there. The way I worked, I could control a murder from the time the cops walked in and saw the body until the trial started. So why couldn't I do the same for the knife? It was a large argument. I couldn't argue the case on my own. It would be too risky. I didn't have time to think about it. I was being summoned. I had to calm myself. I wasn't ready. I stood up abruptly and went out into the center of the room. It was raining outside. I could barely see the other figures out there, but I knew they were there. I could even feel their breath. I had failed. I was falling into desperation. I hadn't counted on it. I had to act. I had to act as if I were in control. But I wasn't. I wasn't very good at this. # Read more by M. L.
