Guests What does a second presidential debate mean for the presidential race and for Donald Trump? That's the question The War Room is looking at. Are Trump and Hillary Clinton — as well as the moderators — getting enough headlines out of a 70-minute showdown Sunday night in St. Louis? The answer, we hope you'll be able to judge for yourself. We start by talking to Rick Wilson, a former Republican political strategist who now is a Trump critic. He says the debate will be a very low-scoring affair. "It's going to be a complete waste of everyone's time," he says. "It's going to be a misfire of a debate." But he thinks the moderators will try to keep it within the three-ring circus format, especially moderator Lester Holt. "This is the only way they know how to run a presidential debate," he says. "This is the way they will do it." But William Bennett, one of the original creators of the debate format, takes a different view. "I think this is going to be good," he says. "I think these two are going to come together. We are going to see a more spirited performance because Donald Trump is so defensive. Hillary Clinton is going to come across as more relaxed." Listen to the Podcast

Bennett argues the debate will be about the future of America, not about the past. "Now they are talking about who won the Middle East," he says. "Now they are talking about Syria. Now they are talking about all these issues. When they start talking about who lost, they are going to get into questions about the past." Bennett thinks the left will want to use the debate to go after Trump's positions on abortion and guns, while the right will try to use it to raise questions about Hillary Clinton's character. And, finally, we run down the issues that viewers need to keep an eye on. They start with the Syrian refugees. Hillary Clinton has already said she'll support bringing in Syrian refugees, while Donald Trump says he won't. But Bennett says the issue is more complicated than that.
