The Art of Recruitment eBook Patience had nearly killed her at the outset of her career. She was a very understanding person, and the owner of a well-stocked mind. It was the owner's great defect that she had too great an opinion of her own capacity, and would not be satisfied until she had reached the goal she had set for herself. Consequently she often failed to do the things she ought to have done. The writer having told the story of this kind of woman, quite naturally we must think of the defects in the composition of the company for which the writer would most certainly have been put. He had to speak of the chief of those defects, the reason for which must be admitted to be obvious. Women will not do business with men. If she had set out with an honest intention to do business with them, she would undoubtedly have succeeded; in fact, her success would probably have been very much greater than it was because she would not have been so prone to fail. But, on the other hand, this is only another way of saying that the sex will not do business with the sex. This is a serious, indeed an unfortunate, blunder. The difficulty of securing good secretaries has been greatly increased by the sex-prejudice involved. When a woman secretary's name appears in the annual report, or when her services are utilized, the assumption seems to be that she will be capable of doing business with the members of her own sex. These women are thought to be in the habit of writing letters and answering the telephone. The men never even think of such duties. As a matter of fact, it is much more than this. The real business of the man is to make money and to enjoy it. The real business of the woman is to make herself and her
