Q: How can I add new QPushButton in to QListWidget? I have a QListWidget and i want to add new QPushButton in QListWidget's header element. How can I do that? A: You add an icon to the list widget: `QIcon dataIcon(":/icons/database.png"); QListWidgetItem *item = new QListWidgetItem(dataIcon, data, top);` Then when you want to add your button, add it to the label: `QListWidgetItem *btn = new QListWidgetItem(buttonName, list); list->addItem(btn);` A: You can: set a static image into QListWidgetItem constructor, use QIcon or QPixmap for your button, use actions (see API) to add push buttons. The latter approach looks like this: `QPushButton *btn = new QPushButton(list.data()); btn->setObjectName("myButton"); btn->setText("My Label"); btn->setMinimumHeight(20); btn->setMaximumHeight(20); // Add action to btn by the name of 'pushButton', or by a uuid: QAction *action = list.actions().at(btn->objectName()); action->setData(QVariant(btn)); action->setCheckable(true); list->addAction(action); list->show();` Growth factors in tumor progression. The only thing I can do is to scroll to the desired place but it "jumps" to that place instantly. I don't want that. How can I do that? A: This should do the trick: `$("#myId").focus(function () { var t = this.scrollHeight; var pos = this.scrollTop; this.scrollTop = (pos > t ? 0 : pos) });` The identification of genes which have an impact on cellular functions has become a major objective of the pharmaceutical industry. While the process of gene cloning has become more efficient, the task of identifying mutations which will have an impact on a certain physiological process has become increasingly daunting.
